Explanation of Local Expenditures: This bill could reduce court time for courts in domestic relations cases. Judicial involvement could be reduced to entering an order to allow arbitration in keeping with the parties' written agreement and to enter judgment on the arbitrator's final decision.

Background Information: Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) allows parties in dispute to resolve differences outside of a courtroom setting. ADR can take two forms: mediation and arbitration. In mediation, a third party assists the parties in dispute in rendering a mutually acceptable agreement, subject to the approval of the court. In arbitration, a neutral third party hears facts and arguments and renders a binding decision. In either case, the hearings occur in a less formal setting and are generally less acrimonious than if the case was decided in a formal hearing.

Currently, only mediation may be used in domestic relations cases. This bill would permit divorcing parties to use arbitration in matters involving child support, custody, or parenting time.

The number of domestic relations cases filed and that have been referred to alternative dispute resolution for the past eight years are shown below:
